2. Student's feedback

- Overarchingly, the students are pleased with the course. There is good feedback on the relevance of the readings, on the structure of the course and that it is useful.
- The students emphasize that they think that the mix between lecturing and the active use of examples from the student's projects works well. They also comment on the room for questions and discussions along the way as positive
- There is feedback on wanting to go deeper into some topics, but that is always going to be the case in such an introduction course
- There is also – as every semester – feedback on that the course is somewhat too lecture focused (at the cost of more active exercises), but where most of the students emphasize that they do not really see how the course could rely less on lectures, since there is so much ground to cover.

3. Overall assessment and further development

- The balancing of the need for more practical, hands-on exercises, and getting through all the topics and elements of the qualitative process is challenging. I will see if I can maybe adjust some of the practical elements and try to add a few more exercises.
